Membership in a professional organization is particularly beneficial for those who work in the legal industry because these associations typically hold educational meetings that provide updates on the issues that affect their jobs.

Many legal professionals have experienced this scenario: “I can’t find a job because I don’t have any experience but how can I get experience if I can’t find a job?” Obtaining employment in the legal industry can be extremely challenging, particularly for a new graduate. But many professional organizations offer career resources to help members break into the job market or find a new position. Being a member of one of these organizations can help you get your foot in the door.

Another benefit to membership in a professional association is the access you get to newsletters, magazines, and other publications that can offer helpful information about the legal industry. Such resources may also provide news about upcoming events, conferences, meetings, and even career opportunities not publicized elsewhere.

Professional organizations can be a great way to increase your own visibility, as well as that of your employer. This increased visibility can be essential when trying to enhance your own professional brand, especially in the beginning of your career, and can help your firm grow, since potential clients like to do business with a familiar face.

There's no uniform constitution that defines a professional organization. Many associations dedicate themselves to the interest of the members, to a point of being registered trade unions, like the United Steelworkers in the US. Others could be societies that purely function to standardize, unify, monitor quality, promote research, further education, along with updating the skills of practicing professionals. A major role of a few organizations is to control the awarding of professional qualification certificates, and even issuing the license of practice. Yet others take up a more disciplinary role for members in that particular profession for maintaining ethical standards.

Late nights and weekends spent in the office are commonplace for legal professionals. But being a member of a professional community will get you out of the firm to connect with like-minded professionals who likely share at least some of the same interests. After all, you all chose to work in the legal industry, right? Take time to connect with others who have made the same decision and are facing the same experiences.

The outcomes of professional society membership contribute to the professional success, growth, and advancement of individual members, while also fostering innovation, collaboration, and excellence within their respective fields.

All the EEE Students are joined in this webinar.
